פרשת וישלח

Parashat Va-yishlah

14 Kislev, 5772 / December 10, 2011
Triennial Cycle Year II: Genesis 34:1-35:15
Humash Etz Hayim, page 206
Haftarah: Obadiah 1:1-21, page 221

1. (34) The rape of Dinah and her brothers' revenge. Everett Fox writes about this chapter, "Like other stories in the Yaakov cycle, it presents us with a somewhat ambiguous situation, where right and wrong are not always simple and the putative heroes are not always heroic."
2. (35:1-15) Various incidents in Jacob's life: He builds an altar at Bethel (fulfilling his vow from many years before), and God renews the divine promise of the land to him.

A Lesson from a Troubling Tale

Rabbi Daniel Pressman

The section is puzzling for several reasons. We can understand that Jacob keeps silent at first because his sons, who could fight to free their sister, are not present (Gen. 34:5). But why does he say nothing when they do return? It is also clear that Jacob — and the Torah — denounce the violent and deceitful action subsequently taken by his sons. But why? Jacob says that by their action they have endangered the tribe, possibly bringing an attack from all the inhabitants of the land (34:30). Yet certainly they were obligated to do something to rescue their sister and to avenge her dishonor. As they say so pungently, “Should our sister be treated like a whore?” (34:31). And even though they acted deceitfully, with guile (34:13), were they not justified under the circumstances since they were heavily outnumbered?

We may have a clue to this mystery when we look at Jacob’s deathbed denunciation of Simeon and Levi:

Their weapons are tools of lawlessness... For when angry they slew men, and when pleased they maimed oxen. Cursed be their anger so fierce, and their wrath so relentless. (Genesis 49:5-7)

Thus the problem with their actions is not that they rescued their sister and killed her rapist, but that they “slew all the males,” “plundered the town,” taking all the wealth, all the children and women as “captives and booty” (Genesis 34:27-28). This must be seen in contrast to Abraham, who made war to rescue his nephew Lot and, when it was all over, refused to take “so much as a thread or a sandal strap” (Genesis 14:23).

Even in war, there are honorable and dishonorable ways of conduct. Jacob’s children, led by Simeon and Levi, have acted dishonorably and inflicted disproportionate injury. They have slain those who were not involved in the crime, when it was not necessary. The men were already disabled and incapable of fighting. There was no need to kill them. There was no excuse for spoil and plunder.

Similar problems occur today as well. The code of ethical conduct of the Israel Defense Forces is an attempt to instill honorable conduct in our soldiers, even in times of war. It indicates things that may be done and things that must be avoided. For example it states:

The IDF servicemen’s purity of arms is their self-control in use of armed force. They will use their arms only for the purpose of achieving their mission, without inflicting unnecessary injury to human life or limb, dignity or property, of both soldiers and civilians, with special consideration for the defenseless.

If Israeli soldiers act differently, they are violating this code of conduct and may be prosecuted and punished.

Jacob’s sons had no restraint, and are therefore condemned even if the cause for which they fought was justified.

The lessons from these two instances are clear. Every effort should be made to follow the example of Jacob — to avoid conflict but to prepare for self-defense when it is unavoidable. When forced to fight, honorable ways should be found to confront the enemy. “All’s fair in love and war” is not a Jewish concept and we should be proud that it is not. Jacob’s condemnation of his own children was a moral act of significance that echoes down to our own days. (Reuven Hammer,
